The constitution of Japan, clearly stipulates respect for the individual and equality under the law. Since the constitution was written, Japan has pressed forward with laws to strive toward Gender equality, and has radically improved the legal status of women. However, there still remain such rigid stereotyped gender roles that hinder the realization of a gender-equal society. Also, to respond to the rapid changes occurring in Japan's socioeconomic situation, such as the trend toward fewer children, the aging of the population, it has become a matter of urgent importance to realizing a gender-equal society in which men and women respect the other's human rights and share responsibilities. In light of this situation, Wako city formulated "The Gender-equality Wako Plan", the second Wako action plan based on the promotion of gender-equality ordinance.
